Who has placed you upon a social level with his own family, mercifully thrown the--the--the veil of oblivion over your humble origin, and opened to you the--the--the gates of the most exclusive society in the world? Mrs. Bom Pas. Quite so, dear. Trimble. This is admirable. BOMPAS. Who, placing his sons happiness above every other consideration, has consented to an alliance between that son and your daughter? Who? Mrs. Hooley. And indeed, Mr. Egerton-Bompas, sir, Im not an ungrateful lady. BOMPAS. Show it, prove it! Mrs. Hooley. But I confess Im not unwilling to relieve you of the burden of my keep and clothing. Bom Pas. I dont want you to relieve me of it! Ive got you! I--I carry you upon my shoulders for as long as you choose to live! Mrs. Bompas. Woman, you dont understand! You couldnt marry now without--without Trimble. Without entering into a long and painful explanation. Mrs. Hooley. Philoo! Id explain everything in five minutes. Mrs. Bompas and Trimble. No! Bompas. Wheres your refinement--wheres your womanly feeling--wheres your sense of shame? They gather round Mrs. Hooley, protesting excitedly. Mrs. Hooley. Have done! Dont bustle me! She breaks away from them, pursued by Mrs. Bompas. Bompas. To Trimble. Well? Well? Trimble. Dear friend, I--I frankly, I--I candidly admit that this is a complication which even I howard enters, in riding dress, with a tradesmans account in his hand. Howard. Morning, morning! Jolly in the Park this morning.. Bompas. f Turning upon him furiously. Jolly in the Park! Howard. There! At me again! A nice time

I've had of it this last month! Didn't you say I might come to you to-day for a cheque for my florist? Bompas. Get out of my sight! Mrs. Bompas and Trimble lead ...
