

Napoleons Travelling Bookshelf

At once erudite, humorous and stylishly contemporary, Sarah Hesketh's debut collection invokes a world of frozen lakes, snow-spun streets and people who have stayed too long. With formal control and precise, crafted language, these poems examine the small relics of lives: china horses in an old peoples home, a caged bird, the thighbone of a Saxon saint. Drawing from myth, history and a close reading of the present, Napoleons Travelling Bookshelf is an impressive and engaging journey into love, identity and what it is to be alone - lost from sight / behind the ice-mapped waves. REVIEWS What Sarah Hesketh's poems do so remarkably is to string a row of images together in such a way that each keeps its distinct hardness while at the same time contributing to a crystalline whole. They are original and utterly convincing. Bernard O'Donoghue Sarah Hesketh writes superbly crafted poems with a very firm hand. Her poems are overflowing with intelligence and scorn for the easy and the cliched, but her ear is as keen as her passion for the right word, the properly perceived state of affairs. When she writes lines like: I am content to form / the small oh of glory, / to add a little polish / to your morning epaulettes (in Faking) you know that the irony you are dealing with is as intricate as lace but as sharp as daggers. Her terrain is not, to extend our analogies, exactly Jane Austen's two inches of ivory because Hesketh's imagination ranges far and wide into some fairly exotic real and literary spaces, but the sense of ivory is there, as is the fierce, delicate carving. It is a melancholy but rigorously beautiful world her poems describe. We also know that every tiny part of every line has been fiercely fought for and that that is the source of the authority.
